

Naydene Brickus is a Vice President at JPMorganChase, leading two large technology teams whose primary responsibility is developing and enhancing the bank's mobile apps. Although this is her first foray into serving on a Board as prestigious as Newark School of the Arts, she is excited for the opportunity to apply skills developed over her career in technology to contribute to the success of Newark School of the Arts students. She attended Arts High School where she majored in music, playing violin and piano. As a student at the predecessor of New School of the Arts, she took African dance and piano classes at The Newark Community Center for the Arts. She attended Howard University as a Political Science major and, unable to leave music behind, sang in three choirs, including the world renowned Chapel and Concert choirs. She attended Columbia University taking graduate courses in Information Systems
